

STEPHEN ONGPIN FINE ART

Jean-Louis-Ernest Meissonier (1815 - 1891)

The Sentry

Watercolour and gouache, over an underdrawing in pencil.

Signed EMeissoner and indistinctly dated at the lower left.

320 x 203 mm. (12 5/8 x 8 in.) [sheet]

A study for a figure of a standing sentry in Meissonier's painting The Orderlies of 1869, formerly owned by the 19th century American collector Alexander T. Stewart and today in the Musée Massey des Hussards in Tarbes. The scene depicts two hussars of the 8th Regiment in conversation with a sentry, and the artist has used, as the setting for the painting, the grounds of his own manor at Poissy. The model for the sentry is apparently one Jacob Leusen, who seems to have posed for many of Meissonier's paintings of hussars, and who was described by Philippe Burty as 'a little, fair, lean-shanked man, who could sit or stand with the fixity of a statue.'

The prominent archway behind the sentry in this drawing differs from the wall seen behind the figure in the finished painting. It appears, therefore, that Meissonier originally intended this sentry to be shown in front of the arched entrance gateway to the old abbey adjoining his estate at Poissy, which is visible, flanked by another sentry, in the left background of the painting.

Two other preparatory studies for The Orderlies are known. An oil sketch of the standing sentry, seen in isolation, is in the collection of the Musée de l'Armée in Paris, while an oil sketch for the mounted hussar at the right is in the Joslyn Art Museum in Omaha, Nebraska.

Literature:

Possibly Constance Cain Hungerford, Ernest Meissonier: Master in His Genre, Cambridge, 1999, p.261, note 70.

Artist description:

‘The incontestible master of our epoch’, as Eugène Delacroix described him, gives some indication of the esteem in which Ernest Meissonier was held by his contemporaries, critics and the public. Enjoying a career of more than fifty years, he was one of the most famous painters of the 19th century, renowned both in France and abroad. Largely self-taught as an artist, he began his career as a designer of wood engravings for book illustrations. Although he exhibited paintings regularly at the Salon from 1834 onwards, winning several medals in later years, Meissonier’s first taste of international fame came at the Exposition Universelle of 1855, when his painting of A Brawl was bought by Napoleon III as a present for Prince Albert of England. Much of his work was on a very small and intimate scale, and reveal the influence of the Dutch genre painters of the 17th century that he had studied as a young apprentice. His subject matter included scenes of 17th and 18th century life, as well as more contemporary depictions of men at leisure, all painted on small panels and executed with a meticulous attention to detail.

From the late 1840’s onwards Meissonier also devoted much of his time to military subjects, basing his paintings on drawings and oil sketches of soldiers, their horses, uniforms and equipment, mostly taken from life. From 1876 onwards Meissonier stopped exhibiting at the Salons, preferring instead to show his work in the annual exhibitions of the Cercle de l’Union Artistique. Meissonier enjoyed considerable financial success as a painter and was the first artist to be awarded the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. He also produced a small number of wax sculptures of horses, intended primarily as aids for his paintings and not cast or publicly exhibited until after his death.