Stephen Ongpin Fine Art

Gwen JOHN (Haverfordwest 1876 - Dieppe 1939)

Portrait of a Reclining Woman

Pencil and grey wash on paper; a page from a sketchbook.

205 x 266 mm. (8 x 10 1/2 in.)

This large sheet belongs with a small group of drawings (and one etching) by Gwen John executed around 1910, each depicting the same model wearing the same clothes, and therefore likely to have been done in one sitting. One of these drawings is today in the Swindon Museum and Art Gallery and another is in the Amgueddfa Cymru – Museum Wales in Cardiff, while others are in private collections. The John scholar Cecily Langdale has noted of these pencil and wash studies that, 'consistently assured in draughtsmanship and economical in means, they rank among her most beautiful drawings.'

It has been suggested that the model for this distinctive group of drawings may be Maude Boughton-Leigh (1881-1945), known familiarly as Grilda, who was an artist who had studied at the Slade5. John first met Boughton-Leigh in Paris, when she employed her as a model, and the two soon became close friends. Grilda's sister Ellen Theodosia, known as Chloë, was also a friend, and likewise the subject of several paintings and drawings by John. The Boughton-Leigh sisters maintained a correspondence with John until her death, and they also sent the artist gifts of clothing and tea from England, while in the summer of 1930, John travelled to Belgium to meet the sisters.

Exhibitions

New York, Davis & Langdale Company, Inc., Gwen John: Paintings, Watercolours, Drawings, 2004, unnumbered; Chichester, Pallant House Gallery, Gwen John: Art and Life in London and Paris, 2023; Cardiff, Amgueddfa Cymru – Museum Wales, Gwen John: Strange Beauties, 2026, no.30.

Literature:

Rachel Stratton and Lucy Woods, ed., Gwen John: Strange Beauties, exhibition catalogue, Cardiff and elsewhere, 2026-2027, p.85, pl.30.

Artist description:

Born in Wales, Gwendolyn Mary John was the second of four children, and was drawing from an early age. In 1895 she began a course of study at the Slade School of Fine Art in London, where her younger brother Augustus had enrolled the previous year. Both Johns remained at the Slade until 1898, with Augustus gaining recognition as one of the outstanding draughtsmen of his generation and soon enjoying success and notoriety. After leaving the Slade in 1898, Gwen spent six months in Paris, studying at James McNeill Whistler's short-lived school of painting, the Académie Carmen, alongside two contemporaries from the Slade, Ida Nettleship and Gwen Salmond. Back in London, she exhibited twice yearly at the New English Art Club between 1900 and 1902, and also showed three paintings as part of an exhibition of Augustus's work in London in 1903. The following year, at the age of twenty-seven and accompanied by her friend, the artist Dorelia McNeill, John settled in Montparnasse in Paris, where she earned a living by modelling for artists. One of these was the renowned sculptor Auguste Rodin, with whom John had a long and intense love affair that lasted some ten years, although the true nature of their relationship was known only to a handful of the sculptor's close friends.

John lived in France for the remainder of her career, over the course of which she produced fewer than two hundred paintings as well as numerous drawings; her subjects were mainly portraits of solitary women and girls, as well as occasional landscapes, interiors and still life compositions. She worked in Montparnasse for seven years, occasionally sending her paintings back to London to be shown at the NEAC, and in 1911 moved to Meudon, in the southwestern suburbs of Paris and near Rodin's country house, although she kept a studio in Paris and spent several summers in Brittany. By this time she had been introduced by Augustus to John Quinn, a prominent American collector of modern art, who began to acquire her paintings and drawings and was to become her most significant patron. From 1912 onwards Quinn sent her a yearly stipend in exchange for her work, and between 1911 and his death in 1924 he acquired almost every painting she wished to sell, eventually coming to own some twenty paintings and around fifty drawings by the artist. (He also lent a painting by her – the only one he owned at the time - to the seminal Armory Show of modern art in New York in 1913, which he had helped to organize.) In 1913 John converted to Roman Catholicism, and from this point began to figure prominently in her work, mainly in paintings and small-scale gouaches of figures at Mass.

Throughout her career John worked mostly in isolation, having preferred to withdraw from both society and artistic circles, first in London and later in Paris. (As one scholar has noted of the artist, 'She cultivated privacy, and a sense of privacy is one of the dominant feelings of her painting...she always worked in solitude, and took only the little she wanted from the great years of the modern movement in the arts.') Although John continued to show at the NEAC in London and also exhibited at the Salon des Tuileries and the Salon d'Automne in Paris, she worked mainly for herself and seems to been largely unconcerned with making her work better known. Only one solo exhibition was held in her lifetime, at the New Chenil Galleries in London in 1926, which included over forty paintings and watercolours and some albums of drawings. Although John appears to have painted relatively little after this date, by 1930 works by her were already in the collections of the Tate Gallery in London, the Manchester City Art Gallery and the Whitworth Art Gallery in Manchester, the Hugh Lane Gallery in Dublin, the Art Institute of Chicago and the Albright-Knox Art Gallery in Buffalo, New York.

Gwen John's beautiful, enigmatic and delicately painted intimist works are almost always modest in scale and subdued in tonality. She painted very slowly and her never signed or dated her work, so establishing a chronology for her oeuvre is not always straightforward. She also often repeated a composition, sometimes producing several variants of a particularly successful work. By around 1930, however, she had largely ceased to paint, although she continued to draw. Her last datable work was done in 1933, and she seems to have stopped working almost entirely for the last five or six years of her life. At John's death in 1939, at the age of sixty-three, the vast majority of her output remained in her ramshackle studio in Meudon, and was inherited by her nephew Edwin John, the son of Gwen's brother Augustus. The following year an exhibition of paintings and drawings from the artist's estate was held under the auspices of the Matthiesen Gallery in London; this was followed in 1947 by a large retrospective exhibition held at the same gallery and later at the Arts Council.

Although over the course of her career Gwen John was always overshadowed by her younger brother Augustus, a larger-than-life character who enjoyed success and notoriety, in recent years her critical reputation has come to surpass his, and she has been celebrated as one of the most significant British artists of the 20th century. Indeed, this is something Augustus had foretold, once stating that 'In fifty years' time I will be known as the brother of Gwen John.'