

STEPHEN ONGPIN FINE ART

Glyn PHILPOT (London 1884 - London 1937)

The Head of a North African Woman

Watercolour and gouache over a pencil underdrawing.

A study of plants and water lilies, drawn in grey wash with blue and green watercolour, on the verso.

312 x 216 mm. (12 1/4 x 8 1/2 in.) [sight]

This fine watercolour was drawn on one of Glyn Philpot's visits to North Africa, where he travelled on various occasions between 1920 and the year before his death. As the artist's biographer has written of a visit to Morocco in the late summer of 1934, 'Five days spent in Spain enabled him to do as many watercolours, a medium he had only recently taken up. In Morocco, where he stayed for a month, he was more prolific. 'Doing masses of work & very happy,' he told [his sister] Daisy; 'Shall not return just yet unless necessary.' ... In another letter, he wrote, 'I am working better and better & hope to have a wonderful lot of watercolours.' Indeed, he did twenty or thirty in Morocco. His subjects were not the touristic sights such as the magnificent mosques, but rather the people, the shops, the courtyards, the scenes of daily life... These are mostly rapid sketches, very delicate in colour, and full of North African sunlight.' Many of Philpot's North African watercolours from that trip were exhibited at the interior designer Syrie Maugham's new shop on Bruton Street in London in March 1935; this was the first exhibition to be devoted to the artist's watercolours.

The present sheet was probably drawn during a return trip to the Maghreb in 1936, when the artist travelled around Morocco, visiting Fez, Casablanca, Moulay Driss Zerhoun, Marrakesh and Tangier. The drawing of water lilies on the verso of the sheet can be related to two similar watercolour studies of the same subject of c.1937, exhibited at the Redfern Gallery that year and later in the collection of Philpot's niece Gabrielle Cross.

This Head of a North African Woman was included in what was to be Philpot's final one-man show, held at the Redfern Gallery in London in November 1937, a few weeks before his death. The exhibition included twenty-five paintings and forty-six watercolours and was a commercial and critical success, with some £2,000 worth of pictures sold in the first week alone. A newspaper review of the exhibition noted, 'The water-colours are all wonderfully accomplished, but here again Mr. Philpot's line is almost too elegant and his colour almost too refined. Can work with so little sense of struggle behind it be quite satisfying? Or is it that this kind of aristocracy in painting has been spoiled for us by the modern fashion for stammering incoherence that passes itself off as sincerity?'

This watercolour was acquired from the 1937 Redfern exhibition by William Henry Smith, 3rd Viscount Hambleden (1903-1948), and remained with his descendants for the next eighty years.

Exhibitions

London, The Redfern Gallery, Figure-Pieces, Portraits, Landscapes & Flower-Pieces in Oil & Watercolour by Glyn Philpot, November 1937, no.43 (as Negro Ikon, priced at 20 gns.); Warsaw, Instytut Propagandy Sztuki, Helsinki, Kunsthalle Helsinki and Stockholm, Liljevalchs konsthall, British Council. Exhibition of Contemporary British Art: Tour of Northern Capitals, 1939, no.52; Chichester, Pallant House Gallery, Glyn Philpot: Fresh and Spirit, 2022.

Literature:

Simon Martin, Glyn Philpot: Fresh and Spirit, exhibition catalogue, Chichester, 2022, p.174, illustrated p.172, fig.186 (where dated 1936).

Artist description:

Born in Clapham, Glyn Warren Philpot studied at the Lambeth School of Art in London and, later, at the Académie Julian in Paris, under the painter Jean-Paul Laurens. Among his earliest paintings were portraits of his family and friends, since he could not afford professional models, and in 1904 he first showed a picture at the Royal Academy. He also began organizing small exhibitions, at borrowed studios and galleries, in order to bring his work to a wider audience. In 1906 Philpot began working from the first of a series of studios in Chelsea and exhibited at the Society of Portrait Painters. Three years later he began showing with the breakaway Modern Society of Portrait Painters, and in 1910 had his first significant one-man exhibition in a London art gallery, which was a modest critical and commercial success. Aptly described, by one friend who met the artist at around this time, as 'a young man of brilliant powers who nevertheless was a traditionalist from the start and not a revolutionary', Philpot counted among his early accomplishments a portrait of a Spanish bullfighter, painted in 1909, that received much critical praise, and a painting of The Marble Worker of 1911, which won the Gold Medal at the Carnegie International Exhibition in Pittsburgh two years later.

In 1912 Philpot became a member of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers, exhibiting with them for the next twelve years. Seen by many as the heir to John Singer Sargent, he developed a highly successful career as a society portrait painter, earning between ten and twelve commissions a year and sending paintings to the annual exhibitions at the Royal Academy. He also produced a small number of sculptures in bronze, and painted mural decorations for the dining room of Port Lympne in Kent for Sir Phillip Sassoon. Elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1915, Philpot became the youngest Royal Academician on his full election to the institution in 1923, and in the same year was the subject of a large retrospective exhibition at the Grosvenor Galleries. Much admired for his refined draughtsmanship, confident technique and sense of colour, Philpot earned a considerable income from his portrait commissions and enjoyed a lavish lifestyle, with homes in London and Sussex. In 1927 he painted a mural for St. Stephen's Hall in Westminster, and in 1930 produced another for the home of Lord and Lady Melchett in London. In the same year he was honoured with a solo exhibition at the Venice Biennale and joined Henri Matisse on the jury for the Carnegie International in Pittsburgh.

In 1931 Philpot decided to move to Paris, which was to prove a turning point in his career. It was in the early 1930s that his style changed dramatically, under the influence of Picasso and Matisse and the art that he encountered in Paris. Bored by portraiture, he began to experiment with new techniques and subjects in paintings which he first showed at the summer exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1932. His newer work found much less acceptance with critics and collectors, however, and many were quite scathing in their assessment of it. (A headline in The Scotsman in 1932 declared that 'Glyn Philpot "Goes Picasso"'.) Philpot lost several of his former clients, who were unhappy with his new, more 'modern' style of painting, and his income suffered greatly, forcing him to sell his country house in West Sussex. During the 1930s exhibitions of his recent paintings and sculptures were held at the Leicester and Redfern Galleries in London, while he continued to travel abroad; to North Africa, Spain and France. He also began producing still life compositions and watercolours, which were easier to sell.

After Philpot's sudden death from heart failure in December 1937, at the age of just fifty-three, a memorial exhibition was held at the Tate Gallery the following summer, although it included no drawings. The subsequent turmoil of the Second World War, however, meant that his work was largely forgotten in later years, despite a handful of museum exhibitions; in Brighton in 1953, London in 1959 and Worthing in 1962. As one critic, writing on the occasion of another exhibition, at the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford in 1976, noted 'Philpot's unerring skill both in drawing and handling of paint, the wide-ranging originality of his subject pictures, and the careful yet sensitive characterisation of his portraits all compare favourably with the half dozen or so early twentieth-century British artists who have become household names. How is it, then, that with these qualities, one of the most sought-after society portrait painters of his time...can have slipped so quickly from the public mind?' In 1984, however, a large retrospective exhibition of Philpot's work, with a particular focus on his portraiture, was held at the National Portrait Gallery in London. More recently, a major exhibition of his oeuvre as a painter and draughtsman, in which the present sheet was included, was shown in 2022 at the Pallant House Gallery in Chichester.

Philpot's superb draughtsmanship is readily evident in his work as a painter, and he was particularly noted for his skill in life drawing. One of the largest extant collections of drawings by the artist is a group of some four hundred sheets, mainly chalk, pencil and charcoal studies from sketchbooks, discovered in a storeroom in one of Philpot's old London studios in 1957 and presented in 1962 to the Courtauld Gallery by his niece, Gabrielle Cross. Other significant groups of drawings by the artist are in the British Museum and the Victoria and Albert Museum in London and the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford.